

LIFE AFTER METH

For 10 years, Brad Glenn has worked with the Cullman Narcotics Enforcement Team in Alabama. As part of a seven-man unit, Sergeant Glenn spends long, hard hours working to reduce meth production and trafficking in his community. Cullman is considered to be a major hub for meth distribution in the southeastern region, and at least 90 percent of Sergeant Glenn's cases are related to the drug. Sergeant Glenn says that during routine traffic stops, it is more common to find meth than alcohol.

Sergeant Glenn believes meth is one of the most destructive drugs he has encountered in his career in law enforcement. However, with effective treatment programs and coordination among law enforcement agencies, the courts, and social services, he believes it is possible to reduce meth production, trafficking, and use.

One of the biggest challenges of Brad's job is sacrificing time with his family and finding a good work/life balance. But one of the most satisfying aspects of his work is when users come back to thank him and let him know that he saved their lives. He is rewarded by knowing that he has made a positive impact in the lives of others.

There can be life after meth.

Find out more at www.methresources.gov